He thanked the Clark family "for the sacrifice he made."

It was an emotional experience for Mrs. Clark as the monument was unveiled.

"Oh, isn't it beautiful." She offered a special thanks and hug to Wayne Beesley, who engraved the monument.

She said it was difficult to express her appreciation to the Provo community "who all helped, for conceiving the idea and following it through." She said she was especially grateful to the doctors at the University of Utah and the heart team who performed the transplant and cared for her husband, "for making it possible for Barney to make this contribution."

The Clarks lived near Seattle for many years where Clark was a dentist. "Regardless of the fact we lived in Seattle 36 years, Provo has been our home," Mrs. Clark said Friday. Other family members wanted to be present but couldn't, she said.

She asked to pay a personal tribute to her husband before closing her remarks. "He was a loving husband and father, an ordinary man," she said. "He gladly and courageously accepted the responsibility to serve his fellowman."

Mrs. Clark has become a volunteer for the Heart Association, traveling around the country several times a month for the organization. She was on her way home to Seattle following the ceremony, coming to Provo from an engagement in Omaha, Neb.

users who used Utah Lake as a storage reservoir.

Last spring Utah Lake rose 4.9 feet above Compromise Level, flooding thousands of acres surrounding the lake, and Lake Landowners filed the $225 million lawsuit against Salt Lake County water users. The lawsuit is pending.

It merely endorses certain concepts including:

- The Legislature would appropriate $10 million for the dredging project, the amount being previously calculated by Salt Lake County and the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers as the minimum amount necessary to accomplish objectives of the plan.

the dredging plan and the post-dredging flow of the river. The parties present agree that they would fully endorse and support an appropriation by the 1984 Utah State Legislature of $10 million to fund the dredging plant. It was further resolved that the parties will work together in resolving
